Area Teacher a Real Stickler for Significant Figures

By Lars Henry

As of last Wednesday, area physics teacher Trent Keynes officially became a "stickler for significant figures." Although this may sound insignificant, the physics department is now up in arms due to the hard feelings of many angry students. Said honors physics sophomore Sam Schmidt in reference to the test that he bombed, "I had 1.2 and the answer was like 1.22." Unfortunately, Keynes' students have nowhere else to turn for assistance. "The person next to me had the same answer too," Alec Ready of Mr. Keynes' fifth period class explained. Although his students are sure they didn't round too early in the problem or forget to change units, the test results reflect a different story. So next time, avoid this problem by double checking your significant figures, even if it's irrational. Which it usually is. Like always.

United States Delays Indefinitely 2010

By Francis Nash

President Barack Obama stunned the world last week after issuing an executive order postponing 2010 for the foreseeable future. Citing a long list of unresolved national crises, Obama announced in an impromptu press conference that "...it would be unwise to proceed into the next year at this point in time."

He continued, "Sagging economic conditions, rampant H1N1 outbreaks, and the lackluster performance of Derrick Rose during his second season have forced us to reconsider our shift into the next decade."

Activist groups are joining conservative members of Congress in condemning the president's recent announcement that he will keep the nation in 2009. "It is clear that your administration has no clear exit strategy for 2009," documentary filmmaker Michael Moore said in an open letter to Obama posted on his Web Site. "For the sake of your presidency, and the future of our nation, please let us proceed into the next decade."

While many such protestors are urging the government to rethink a pushback of the new year, the plan is apparently set in stone, with Obama having issued his final orders to calendar manufacturers last Thursday. The White House is trying to assure both sides of the debate, offering several extra months to the year while simultaneously placing renewed emphasis on an exit strategy.

"I am committed to developing a timetable to proceed into 2010 in the most expeditious way possible," the President assured the American public. "My administration is working closely with world leaders, with the goal of the safe and orderly deployment of the new year."

This move, however, does make financial sense as our national debt is compounded daily and doesn't grow as long as the calendar doesn't change.

Concern Builds as Women Everywhere Follow Oprah's Progressively Stranger Recommendations

By George Minkowski

In recent days, Oprah Winfrey has begun an alarming descent into insanity. However, middle-aged women around the country continue to take her increasingly bizarre advice.

Oprah has long been known to promote numerous products and activities on her nationally syndicated show, "The Oprah Winfrey Show." Reports of Oprah's senility have alarmed sensible and independent people everywhere, as Oprah's cult of followers has neither recognized her steady mental decline nor ceased to follow her advice. "Oprah used to give regular suggestions, and I'll admit that I did some of what she said," says Robin Halcombe, 42, who has watched the famous talk show host's program for several years. "Adopting pets and buying ergonomic garden tools seemed normal enough, but when she started telling people to bathe in motor oil, I was more than a bit hesitant to comply. Honestly, nobody is going to do this weird stuff!"

The thousands of anxious housewives crowding outside Jiffy Lubes everywhere prove quite the contrary. Though reports of Winfrey's psychosis have dominated the media over the past several weeks (including leaked photos of her consumption of several whole sticks of butter), determined women are clearly not ready to stop listening to what she has to say.

"I'm really worried about my mommy," says local first grader Tommy Wellington, son of devout Oprah follower Elena Wellington. "Yesterday, mommy wrapped everything in my house in aluminum foil because the lady on TV told her it would keep the bad spirits away. She even wrapped individual M&Ms."

In related news; Chicago traffic has become nearly intolerable as millions of women drive to Millennium Park in order to worship the Bean upon the request of Winfrey. The once-respected talk show host has been perched atop the eminent sculpture for several days, trying in vain to convince a squirrel to accompany her to the movies.
